

Executives flooded with information... no time to think!

According to the Harvard Business Review's 'Stop Wasting Valuable Time' (Sept. 2004), executives surveyed are reporting they spend less than 3 hours per month working collectively on strategic issues. They report spending more than 65% of their time in meetings that are held for the sole purpose of sharing information.

"Executives are clamoring for time to do the most basic thing they have been hired to do - THINK" says Jerry McNellis, Founder of The Compression Planning Institute and The Executive Decision Making System. "Too many execs are buried in the minutia of information and they don't have adequate time to pursue any type of strategic thinking together."

Jerry is an insightful, "from the trenches" interview. He'll tell your audience:

- How executives are currently spending their collective time
- Why most meetings fail before they ever begin
- How to free up time for strategic thinking
- Why the most important person who can make this happen is not part of the executive team
- The harsh reality about the decisions that executives make

Jerry McNellis has facilitated countless meetings and trained thousands of individuals in how to lead strategic planning sessions. He developed The Executive Decision Making System used by executive teams across the country. He is also a guest presenter for Geneva College in their Master of Science in Organizational Leadership's Decision Making class.
